Picture yourself relaxing on a sunny Mediterranean beach in a few years’ time. Will you have chosen to go in June, when the mercury’s in the mid-20s, and the ice-cubes in your glass don’t melt until you’re half-way through your cocktail? Or will you be travelling with kids in August, when it’s more than 30C, and the sand’s so hot you can’t walk down to the sea without your flip-flops on?

Whichever your preferred time, the temperatures in your favourite Mediterranean resorts may soon be far toastier than you’re used to, with scientists predicting that, as early as 2070, the average global temperature may have increased by between four and six degrees.

Scientists have been giving this warning for some time, but what I hadn’t appreciated, until a lively session at the Responsible Tourism in Destinations conference in Manchester last week, was that temperatures during a heat-wave in Europe could reach eight degrees more – making Greece as hot as 47C – surely too hot for comfort.

But rather than simply debating the issues, the focus at this year’s RTD conference was on the processes by which the travel industry could bring about change.

I was inspired to hear about Thomson Cruises’ achievements in reducing its carbon emissions, and the work that the International Hotel Partnership has done on carbon reporting and human trafficking.

It was also interesting to hear VisitEngland’s chief executive and the chair of Abta’s UK Leisure and Tourism Group underline the importance of agents in promoting responsible holidays – whether selling more sustainable places to stay or supporting local heritage here in the UK.

You can read stories from the conference on pages 5, 8 and 9, and more on ttgdigital.com. And next time you sell a summer sun holiday, spare a thought for a time 50 years hence when those destinations might be unrecognisable – and ask yourself if you are playing your part in safeguarding holidays for the future.

04 NEWS

08 Conference report: News from RTD8 in Manchester
10 TTG Interview: SuperBreak’s Jane Atkins and Graham Balmforth on the tour operator’s rebrand and strategy
12 City: Patrick Whyte on the results of the Thomas Cook/Co-op joint venture
14 Aviation: Delta Airlines celebrates its move into Heathrow’s Terminal 3
16 Cruise: Regent Seven Seas launches a retail training programme
18 Luxury Travel: Consumer trends among the UK’s affluent under scrutiny at upcoming tgluxury-Seminar
20 The week in travel: Sunvil adds historic properties in Portugal, while Travel 2 invites agents to throw another shrimp on the barbie

22 INTELLIGENCE

Amadeus research: Achieving seamless travel is likely to be hampered by a lack of coordination

26 TALK

27 Chris Lee takes stock of the current environment facing travel businesses: “Crucially for our industry, consumer confidence is on the rise again.”

It’s easy to get in touch – you can email me pjacks@ttgdigital.com – or tweet me at twitter.com/philippajacks

28 TOOLKIT

28 Selling Power: Can a travel firm thrive without a web presence? Chloe Cann meets Highgate Travel to find out
31 Technology: How to stay on the right side of Google’s new regulations
34 Marketing Magic: We join TTG competition winner Ben Corp for his consultancy session with Flagship
35 Get Ahead: Why recruiting outside the industry is working for Holidaysplease
36 Mystery Shopper: It’s Sunninghill and Chobham vs the internet in a battle for a Bahamas booking

41 FEATURES

41 On Our Radar: Clipper sailing and luxury fort living – Katherine Lawrey has a grand day out in the Solent
43 Caribbean: Swimming pigs and other Bahamian selling points, plus 60 Seconds with the ministry of tourism; Pippa Jacks checks out Sandals LaSource in Grenada; advice for taking under-fives to the Caribbean; plus Olympic champ Rebecca Adlington’s Palm Island swimming workshops

62 GETAWAY

TTGina with all of the latest gossip